Re: Consumers Groups' Comments on EPA's Proposed "Clean Power Plan"
(Docket ID No. OAR-2013-0602)

Introduction

Consumers Union;¹ National Consumers Law Center, on behalf of its low-income clients;² Action, Inc.;³ Citizens for Citizens;⁴ and The Massachusetts Energy Directors Association⁵ (collectively "consumer groups") submit the following comments in response to the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency ("EPA") in the

² Since 1969, the National Consumer Law Center has used its expertise in consumer law and energy policy to work for consumer justice and economic security for low-income people. NCLC's expertise includes policy analysis and advocacy; consumer law and energy publications; and training and advice for advocates.

³ Action, Inc. is a community action program based in Gloucester, Massachusetts. Its mission is to improve the lives of disadvantaged individuals and families in Cape Ann and beyond by minimizing the effects of poverty, promoting economic security, and advocating for social change. Action delivers energy programs including LIHEAP, the Weatherization Assistance Program (WAP) and utility-funded energy efficiency programs to low-income households in the greater Cape Ann area.

⁴ Citizens for Citizens is a community action program based in Fall River, Massachusetts. Its mission is to advocate on behalf of low-income residents and attack the causes and effects of poverty through the provision of direct and integrated services, the promotion of self-sufficiency, and the advancement of social change. CFC delivers energy programs including LIHEAP, WAP and utility-funded energy efficiency programs to low-income households in the cities of Fall River and Taunton and in several adjoining towns.

above-referenced matter. In addition, 4,640 consumers have signed a petition in support of the proposed rule, which is included in Appendix B.

Air pollution and climate change are a serious threat to our nation's well-being, and emission standards that protect and promote public health are critical in guarding against these threats. Consumer groups support EPA's proposed Clean Power Plan to establish state-specific emission reduction targets and encourage state-initiated plans conforming with Section 111(d) of the Clean Air Act. By 2030, this plan would reduce CO₂ emission from the power sector by an estimated 30 percent compared with 2005 emission levels. EPA's "building blocks,"⁶ as presented by the proposed rule, offer states flexibility to reduce carbon pollution while diversifying the energy supply, ensuring reliability, and protecting affordability. While maintaining this flexibility, consumer groups urge EPA to require states' implementation plans to maximize cost-effective energy efficiency, promote transparency and comparability, and include consumer participation and oversight, especially to promote the interests of households most vulnerable to electricity bill impacts.

Comments

The Costs of Inaction on Climate Change Are Significant

As scientists increase the body of knowledge on climate science, new risks and potential tipping points emerge. The more we learn, the more imminent and catastrophic the potential harms appear. Both as citizens and as consumers, we could pay a very high price for destabilizing the earth's climate.

Climate change threatens the stability and cost of nearly everything we purchase and rely on for every-day life—including water, food, and energy, and the impacts of climate change are most devastating to communities that are already the most vulnerable, especially the elderly and families that live near or below the poverty line.

Essential infrastructure is built upon assumptions about existing weather patterns and distribution of water, food, and energy resources. A hotter planet will see changed and intensified storm patterns, diminished fresh water resources, and increased ozone pollution. Fisheries, farms, watersheds, oceans, forests and other ecosystems will all be affected, in turn impacting food production and prices, as well as air and water quality. Worsened air quality and heat waves harm public health and increase health care costs. Higher energy demand in some regions for cooling, water delivery, and food production will tax the electrical grid and transportation systems. Intensified competition for water threatens not only drinking water supplies, but also places pressure on the energy sector, whose power plants require large amounts of water for cooling.

The costs of inaction are high and will only increase over time as more drastic measures will become necessary to adapt and attempt to restore balance to an altered global climate. The most cost-effective, fair, and self-preserving action we can take is to reduce greenhouse gas emissions from the biggest emitters. The highest-emitting sector—electricity—is a logical sector to focus on for intensifying efforts to reduce carbon pollution. Combined with transportation, where EPA is also taking positive steps to limit emissions from mobile sources, these two sectors account for more than 60% of greenhouse gas emissions in the United States.

Energy Efficiency is Essential to Implement an Affordable Clean Power Plan

Energy efficiency is often called the “fifth fuel” and is a win-win for emissions reduction and consumer savings. The inclusion of energy efficiency as one of the building blocks for compliance with the proposed rule provides tremendous opportunity for states to reduce emissions at an affordable cost. In many cases, as noted in a Synapse report titled “Unleashing Energy Efficiency,” energy efficiency is a “no regrets” policy that would save utilities and consumers money regardless of emission reduction targets.⁷

Many of the states that have the highest emission levels of carbon pollution also have the most inefficient electricity utilization and delivery. In fact, ten of the states in the top 25 highest carbon emissions from electricity rank in the bottom third of ACEEE’s state rankings for energy efficiency.⁸ This means that states with the most room for improvement have a vast and affordable resource to cut emissions before they even look to the other building blocks.

Investments in energy efficiency put downward pressure on rates by avoiding capital and operating costs for decades to come. Accounting for these lasting benefits is important for states to make sure they are investing in cost-effective energy efficiency and including all the benefits in allocating program investments. One way to account for the benefits of energy efficiency is to use a rubric such as the Resource Value Framework, which helps any state determine if an efficiency program is cost-effective by identifying costs and benefits to the utility, participants, and the public over a time frame within which these costs and benefits are likely to occur.⁹

States Have Flexibility to Reduce Emissions at an Affordable Cost

Setting limits on carbon pollution emission from the power sector is important for public health and the climate. It also presents an opportunity to improve the electricity delivery system in the U.S. and better serve residential ratepayers, who ultimately pay for the largest percentage of power in the United States.¹⁰ Although EPA is responsible for administering the Clean Air Act, the practical impact and strength of the Clean Power Plan proposal lies with the states. By utilizing various arrangements of the four building blocks, states can use the flexibility in the rule to choose a path to either run up or rein in costs of cutting emissions. Cost-effectiveness is largely in states' hands, but EPA can help states do a better job of delivering consumer benefits and help hold states accountable if they do not serve consumers well under the Clean Power Plan.

As shown in the chart below, a state plan with a tepid commitment to emission reduction and consumer protections can result in consumers paying more for dirtier energy, while a state with strong consumer protections and a strong commitment to emission reduction can offer consumers cleaner and more affordable energy.

	Strong Commitment to Lower Emissions	Weak Commitment to Lower Emissions
Strong Consumer Protections	Cleaner, Affordable Energy <ul style="list-style-type: none"> • Successful emission reductions • Consumers save money 	Higher Pollution, Affordable Energy <ul style="list-style-type: none"> • Unsuccessful emission reductions • Consumers do not save money or pay more
Weak Consumer Protections	Cleaner, More Expensive Energy <ul style="list-style-type: none"> • Successful emission reductions • Consumers pay more 	Higher Pollution, Expensive Energy <ul style="list-style-type: none"> • Unsuccessful emission reductions • Consumers pay more

Electricity rates can and will increase for many reasons that have nothing to do with limits on emissions, but through the Clean Power Plan, EPA can encourage states to focus on investments that can lower consumer electric bills. Unlike oil and gasoline prices, electricity rates are generally regulated and so in most states, sudden price spikes are uncommon. Nationally, retail residential electricity rates are actually slightly lower in real terms than they were in 1960 and have, on average, been fairly steady over the last 50 years.¹¹ However, many of the infrastructure investments made decades ago are now approaching the end of their useful life, so increased investment is needed to maintain current capacity.

Other state- or utility-specific factors that can also cause an upward tick in rates for residential ratepayers are regional, national, or global price increases of natural gas, coal, or oil; increased demand; new rate structures that redistribute subsidies among ratepayer classes; increased exposure to spot market prices; droughts that reduce hydropower output; and other factors. Inadequate oversight to guard against possible market manipulation of wholesale or spot prices has also exposed consumers to bill shock in states that allow greater consumer exposure through variable rates.¹²

EPA's economic analysis identifies expected net bill savings as a result of the proposed rule. Diversifying the fuel supply, decreasing operating costs through increased renewables, and increasing energy efficiency will all work to lower customer bills even in the face of possible short-term rate increases. But some state regulators already do a better job than others in delivering value to residential ratepayers and keeping electric bills in check. The Clean Power Plan can actually improve upon the status quo through encouraging state regulators to commit to an affordable implementation plan that enhances consumer involvement and increases energy efficiency.

EPA Should Promote Consumer-Friendly State Implementation Plans

Section 111(d) of the Clean Air Act requires EPA to implement the "best system of emission reduction" (BSER) that, taking into account the cost of achieving such reduction and any non-air quality health and environmental impacts and energy requirements, the Administrator determines has been adequately demonstrated.

Although each state has its own regulatory construct for soliciting, incorporating, and addressing the interests of residential ratepayers, it is reasonable for EPA to require that each state plan include an adequate mechanism to protect consumers as an essential means to limit cost. A plan that does not contemplate constraining residential rates should not be reasonably recognized as meeting the “best system of emission reduction,” which must take cost into account. While a state could conceivably force onto residential consumers any increased costs from reducing emissions, by subsidizing commercial or industrial energy consumers, or by giving short shrift to energy efficiency, these actions would not meet the definitional requirement that BSER include “non-air quality health and environmental impacts.” Electricity is an essential service for health and safety purposes, and EPA should insist that states reduce emissions cost-effectively and lower consumer electric bills where it is feasible to do so.

To implement a successful program, EPA has a keen interest and a legal responsibility to ensure that state plans include strong consumer protections.

There are at least three ways that EPA can accomplish this objective:

1. emphasize cost-effective energy efficiency, and help states share information to implement successful programs that save energy and money;
2. mandate transparency and data collection as part of each implementation plan, and publicly disclose states’ plans and progress in a manner that is accessible to the average consumer; and
3. require consumer participation and oversight to ensure fairness for consumers.

Cost-effective energy efficiency helps lower bills no matter what other factors may be contributing to rate increases. Dozens of states have a wealth of knowledge and a proven record of improving efficiency and saving ratepayers money, and EPA can help facilitate the sharing of states’ expertise. As noted above, energy efficiency should be a mainstay of any consumer-friendly state implementation plan, and EPA should not approve a state plan as meeting the BSER if robust energy efficiency measures are not included. In addition, when customer participation is required to reap the savings of a program, such programs should include a strategy for achieving high participation rates, especially among low-income ratepayers.

Another pressure point to hold states accountable to the BSER standard is to require transparency, analysis, and data to compare how states are serving consumers through the state plans. If these data are disclosed and presented in an accessible and easy-to-understand format, consumers in one state could compare to see whether their state could be doing a better job in reducing emissions and lowering consumer bills. This would help keep state regulators more transparent and accountable regarding the choices they are making and opportunities they may be missing for delivering affordable, cleaner energy to consumers. As part of the data and analysis to be collected, EPA should require that states report on the bill impacts of several reasonable alternatives and explicitly include impacts for low-income ratepayers. If a state chooses an alternative that has negative impacts for low-income ratepayers, then its plan must include strategies it has developed to mitigate them.

A third way for EPA to help consumers in every state would be to require consumer participation and oversight in the states' and utilities' actions under the implementation plans. Decreasing demand through improved energy efficiency and fuel diversity are key to energy affordability, and consumers have an important role to play in holding states, utility boards, and utilities accountable for cost-effective investments and programs that reduce emissions, maintain affordability, and use energy efficiently.

Variables that can increase electric bills are increased infrastructure costs (most of which would be needed regardless of emission targets), low participation rates in energy efficiency programs, higher rates of return for utility shareholders, or higher fixed charges or surcharges on bills. While managing the risks of these variables is largely in states' hands, EPA can require as part of BSER that consumer interests be represented in addressing such variables in an implementation plan.

Forty states already have a designated consumer advocate for utility proceedings, so these entities could play an important role in successful implementation plans.¹³ However, even for states that do not have such a formal designee, EPA could require public notice and comment, economic analysis from a consumer standpoint, or at a minimum, a requirement that each plan include actions to make sure efficiency programs and any changes to rate design (resulting from the implementation plan) will help lower bills for residential ratepayers, especially low-income residents.

In summary, EPA can help consumers in all states by helping states develop successful energy efficiency measures and programs and enhance transparency and consumer protection in order to deliver the greatest emission reductions in the most equitable and affordable manner.

Conclusion

For the reasons stated above, consumer groups support the above-referenced proposed rule, and urge the EPA to move forward to finalize this

NASUCA Resolution on 111(d) compliance passed at NASUCA's November 2014 Annual Meeting, but the vote count was not published prior to comment deadline

NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF STATE UTILITY CONSUMER ADVOCATES

Resolution 2014-_____

Urging The Environmental Protection Agency (EPA) To Require State-Level Authorities Implementing Any Final Version of The “Clean Power Plan” To Seek Input From Local NASUCA Members

WHEREAS, the National Association of State Utility Consumer Advocates (NASUCA) is an association of 44 consumer advocates in 40 states and the District of Columbia. NASUCA’s members are designated by the laws of their respective jurisdictions to represent the interests of utility consumers before state and federal regulators and in the courts;

WHEREAS, on June 26, 2012, Resolution 2012 – 05 was passed by NASUCA “Urging the Environmental Protection Agency to Establish Compliance Timelines that Provide Sufficient Time to Consider Appropriate Least Cost Responses so as to Avoid Rate Shock to Electric Utility Customers”. NASUCA urged the EPA and other relevant policy makers to implement environmental regulations taking into account the following considerations:

- Compliance timelines must make reasonable allowance for the physical, financial, and regulatory challenges associated with the engineering, procurement, construction, and regulatory review of new demand-side resources, supply-side resources and/or upgrades at existing electric generation plants;
- Compliance timelines must allow state regulators sufficient time to fully evaluate utility compliance proposals in evidentiary hearings;
- Compliance timelines must provide sufficient time and flexibility to maintain the integrity and reliability of the existing electric system;
- Compliance timelines must take into account the impact of rate increases that can result as utilities seek recovery from customers;

WHEREAS, on June 2, 2014, pursuant to Section 111(d) of the Clean Air Act, the EPA released its proposed emissions performance guidelines for reducing CO₂ from existing fossil fuel power plants. The EPA has stated that its 111(d) rule—known as the “Clean Power Plan”— will reduce greenhouse gas emissions from these existing sources by 30 percent below 2005 levels by 2030. According to the EPA, meeting the emission reductions proposed in the Clean Power Plan will require electric utilities and electric generators to, in some mixture, increase generation efficiency, change generation fuel mix, which may include building new natural gas fired generators and/or closing existing coal fired generators, increase the use of renewable energy generating sources and increase the use and availability of energy efficiency and/or conservation measures.

WHEREAS, state-level implementation of any final version of the proposed Clean Power Plan will generally reside at a state-level environmental agency. In most cases, the state-level environmental agency in charge of implementing the Clean Power Plan will have different objectives and obligations than the state-level agency that regulates electric utility resource planning and rates (i.e., Public Utilities Commission).

WHEREAS, the number of NASUCA member offices that have clear jurisdiction to participate before a state-level environmental agency is less than the number of NASUCA members that have jurisdiction to participate before the state-level agency that regulates electric utility resource planning and rates. As such, many NASUCA member offices, and the utility customers they represent, may be specifically excluded from participating in important decisions affecting changes to electric utility resource planning, the resources used to meet customer energy needs, the cost of these resources and impacts on customer rates that result from these resources changes.

NOW THEREFORE NASUCA RESOLVES

Without specifically taking a position on the merits, mechanics or requirements of the proposed EPA Clean Power Plan, NASUCA urges the EPA and other relevant policy makers to:

1. Ensure that NASUCA members, and the utility customers they represent, are included in the state-level implementation process, and resource decisions required thereby, envisioned in any final version of the Clean Power Plan, including;
 - a. At minimum, the EPA should require any state-level environmental agency charged with implementation of any final version of the Clean Power Plan seek input from the state NASUCA member.
2. Any final version of the Clean Power Plan conform to the considerations listed in NASUCA Resolution 2012-05.

BE IT FURTHER RESOLVED that NASUCA authorizes its Executive Committee to develop specific positions and to take appropriate actions consistent with the terms of this resolution. The Executive Committee shall advise the membership of any proposed action prior to taking such action, if possible. In any event, the Executive Committee shall notify its membership of any action taken pursuant to this resolution.

Petition to EPA: I support the Clean Power Plan

I strongly urge the EPA to move forward with your proposed framework to reduce carbon pollution from existing power plants. This plan will improve my family's health and our environment through improved air quality in our community. And by encouraging a common-sense mix of clean energy and energy efficiency, we will see a reduction in pollutants that accelerate devastating climate change.

It's time for real action when it comes to air quality and climate change, and I support the EPA's Clean Power Plan.
